Netflix's stake purchase signals upcoming power shift

Studio Dragon signs production/distribution deal with Netflix; CJ ENM to sell 5% stake in Studio Dragon to Netflix

Yesterday, Studio Dragon announced that it had signed a deal with Netflix (NFLX US/CP: US$311.69) to produce/distribute at least 21 dramas over a three-year period. The deal includes: 1) the production of Netflix originals; as well as 2) the sale of distribution rights to other Studio Dragon titles. The number only covers new titles that will be produced from 2020 and does not reflect potential sales of older titles. CJ ENM (035760 KQ/Buy/TP: W195,000/CP: W151,500) simultaneously announced that it had struck a deal with Netflix giving it the right to sell a 4.99% stake in Studio Dragon to the streaming company within the next year. The shares will be sold at an agreed-upon price at the time CJ ENM exercises its right.

Key takeaways: Project margin upgrade, stabilization of big-budget productions, and higher content value

The production/distribution agreement allows Studio Dragon to increase its production budget and distribute its content regardless of a title's success. The production/distribution of seven titles (low end) per year is largely in line with our original assumption, but the guarantee of a certain number of original productions and the sale of distribution rights should make it easier for the company to branch into more diverse genres and expand its budget. In addition, broadcasting rights fees (production cost recoupment) and original production margins are likely to be set higher than previous levels. Overall, we expect project margins to trend upwards (higher profitability and less volatility). Furthermore, the deal could provide an opportunity for Studio Dragon to promote its production capabilities during the early stages of global OTT competition.

In our view, Netflix's stake purchase is proof of the strong need for content among global OTTs. While the deal gives CJ ENM and Studio Dragon the opportunity to produce/distribute premium content, it also ensures Netflix a stable flow of content from one of Asia's leading production studios. Coming at a time when platform competition is set to heat up, the decision by Netflix, a leading global platform, bolsters the case that content value will rise during the media industry realignment that is expected to begin next year.

Lift TP to W112,000; Latest deal calls for higher multiple

We maintain our Buy call on Studio Dragon and lift our target price to W112,000, applying a target P/E of 52x to our 2020 net profit attributable to controlling interests estimate. We believe the latest deal calls for an increase in the company's fair multiple. While the impact on 2020 estimates is limited, the deal raises the company's growth potential from 2021 onward. After bottoming in 2019, we expect operating profit to grow 105% in 2020 and 37% in 2021, supported by customer diversification (which should boost both licensing prices and volume), bigger production budgets, and the normalization of amortization expenses.

Contrary to worries, we do not think Netflix's stake purchase will bind Studio Dragon to the streaming company. The 5% stake and seven production/distribution titles per year represent just 20% of the company's float (25%) and production capacity (over 40 titles), a level that we believe is too low to restrict the company to a single platform. Rather, we think the size of the deal leaves enough room for the addition of new customers as more OTT players enter the market.

The value of content producers is set to rise once again. Netflix's latest decision comes at a time when competition from new platforms looms in 2020. A rival streaming service is already available, following a recent successful debut. The direction set by global platforms is clear. We recommend taking a positive approach to Studio Dragon, looking toward 2020-21 and beyond.
